In the not-so-distant future, the streaming giant will replace its current five-star ratings system with something a little easier: thumbs up or down. You either liked it or you didn't; no more internal debates over just how much or how little you enjoyed something.

The change will go into effect globally, beginning in April. Netflix will also s tart showing users an algorithm-based percentage match for each show and movie, giving people an idea of how likely they are to enjoy it.

“Given that star ratings have traditionally been used to indicate quality i n entertainment, members were sometimes confused about how to think about rating a title,” Netflix said in a statement to PCMag. The new system should be m ore straightforward, enabling members to tell the company what type of titles th ey did and didn't enjoy.

Netflix has been considering this move for a while. Business Insider, citing the company's Chief Product Officer Neil Hunt, in January 2016 reported(Opens i) Tj T* B omething better.

“The problem, Hunt tells Business Insider, is that people subconsciously tr y to be critics,” the site reported at the time. “When they rate a mov ie or show from one to five stars, they fall into trying to objectively assess t he “quality;” instead of basing the stars on how much “enjoyment”

; they got out of it.”

So, if you got a lot of enjoyment out of watching a movie, but only rated it two stars because it's not what the rest of the world would deem a quality pict ure, Netflix will think you hated it. In the future, the streaming site might no t recommend a similar title you actually might have watched and enjoyed.

“More people rated and number of ratings they gave increased too,” the company added.
