Launched in 2014, it offers up to $5,000 to employees who leave and agree never to return.

Amazon has suspended the program amid the tight labor market, The Information reported.

The pay-to-quit program helps the ecommerce giant quickly cut down its workforce after the busy holiday season, per The Information. It also helps the company s hed disengaged workers, Business Insider's Hayley Peterson reported in 2018.

Under the program, Amazon offers a $2,000 payout to workers who have been with t he company for one year, which increases by $1,000 for each year of service to t op out at $5,000, according to founder Jeff Bezos's annual letter to sharehol ders in 2014. The program is modeled after a similar one at Zappos, an Amazon su bsidiary, Bezos wrote in the letter.

The suspension of the program after the holiday season coincides with a labor cr unch in the US that has hit large companies employing supply-chain workers espec ially hard.

Amazon has also been facing high turnover rates for hourly employees due to burn out, according to a major New York Times investigation published in June.
