The term problem gambling describes gambling behaviour that has become destructive or damaging to the gambler or to those around them.

Problem gambling can make each day a struggle.

Problem gamblers may feel the urge to continue gambling even when doing so will likely result in negative consequences.

Problem gambling is described as a behavioural addiction and it shares many of the same features of other addictions.

This feeling may give you a break from other, more difficult feelings – it may provide a temporary escape from the reality of life as it is.

It can be extremely difficult to write off the money, time and emotional energy already spent on gambling, and it is also important to recognise that the activity of gambling is often being used as an escape from difficult feelings.

A good strategy for quitting gambling includes thinking carefully about how you manage your money, how you manage your time (you are likely to have much more free time) being honest with those around you and about what steps you can take to block access to gambling.

Speaking to someone about your situation can help you to get a better perspective on how to move forwards.
