The analysis by consumer group Which? suggests that millions of consumers could be unwittingly handing over their personal data or money to apps that have cheated their way to the top of the world's two most prominent mobile app stores. One fake review broker site, called reviewlancer, claims to have sold nearly 53,000 reviews and exchanged more than 130,000 reviews. Which? said another red flag was the apparent bulk uploads of reviews, where clusters of four and five-star feedback appeared over a few days, before another spike was seen a few weeks or months later. The consumer group recommends that customers sort reviews by a variety of ways rather than just helpfulness or relevancy to avoid manipulated results. Up to a quarter of reviews in the health and fitness section of Google's Play Store were suspicious, while for Apple's equivalent 17 per cent appear fake. Google did not comment on the analysis but said it had taken appropriate action against review brokers who used its search engine.

I was skeptical because I thought they were all over the place. I was skeptical at first but I am so glad I finally decided to give them a try. They are not only effective but they work great! My shoes smell great! I love these! They are a little gross but they are actually a little greasy. A pack of stain and odor eliminators to help you get rid of those unsightly messes and messes.
