To deliver a service of this scale and complexity, Amazon relies on a network of thousands of drivers. Rather than keeping these workers on its books, it manage s them through what are called delivery service providers, small companies that handle groups of drivers, who work as self-employed independent contractors with no right to holiday pay, sick pay or the "national living wage".

Pavlina Draganova of campaign group Organise said that while pay was returning t o the same levels as before the Christmas peak season, for many it still represe nted a real-terms cut.

Rates of pay can differ radically around the country, as small groups of drivers are managed by small companies known as "delivery service partners"., rather than directly by Amazon.

They get extra for fuel but say the per-mile rate doesn't always cover actua l costs, particularly since the increase in fuel prices. Several drivers said th ey received 21p per mile in fuel payments but would need at least 25p per mile t o cover their actual costs as petrol prices have soared during the war in Ukrain e.

Sam*, another driver near Birmingham, said: "In 2020, when we were in serio us [pandemic] lockdown, I got £160 a day and after that it has got less and less. It is hard work and they follow [your progress on the route] on the compu ter so you can't have even one minute break."

Kate Robinson is a lawyer at Leigh Day who is leading legal action by Amazon dri vers who say they should be entitled to basic employment rights such as the nati onal living wage and holiday pay. These are denied as Amazon says they are self-employed independent contractors.
