Advertising profits surpassed all of Amazon's subscriptions services combined, spiking 58% in 2021, and cash keeps coming. The pivot is part of a larger trend.

An Amazon corporate office building

Pull up Amazon to search for a product, and there's one thing you're guaranteed to see no matter what you want to buy: ads. That isn't a fluke. The Amazon website and the app are so full of ads that it actually makes it harder to shop, according to recent reports from both Vox and the Washington Post. But if the company's recent profits are any indication, don't expect things to change any time soon. These days, Amazon makes more money from advertising than from Prime.

You can feel the growth of the ads business in the experience of shopping on Amazon. The Post's recent Amazon story features an interactive graphic highlighting just how many ads you have to sift through. The first batch of visible search results is often nothing but sponsored products, and the field is typically crowded with more ads as you scroll down. You can look for the tiny gray "sponsored" disclaimer for an indication, but other content is competing with the most relevant products, too, including Amazon's promotion of its own products.

Even when you type in the name of a specific brand, other company's products often show up first. It's hard to argue that it doesn't make for a worse customer experience when the search results you searched for are buried below paid promotion.

It's not just Amazon that's polluting its feed with ads. Google search results are equally as crowded with advertising. When I checked over the weekend, I saw an ad on Twitter about every five tweets. On YouTube, the number of ads that play before a video and the number of ad breaks interrupting videos have skyrocketed. Apple has started slipping more ads into its App Store, and the company is reportedly planning to bring ads to Apple TV. Advertisers can now reach you on Netflix and Disney+, too.
